

William Storrar's point of view about fundraising humanistic research activities

February 1, 2017

Storrar is part of a leading international group of theologians, social scientists and other scholars, on issues facing public theology for the 21st century.

William Storrar is Director of the Center of Theological Inquiry in Princeton, an ecumenical institute for interdisciplinary research in the field of religion. The common thread of his work is the practice of collaboration in the academy, church, and civil society.

I've asked him to tell us, starting from his long experience, what are the lessons learnt while fundraising humanistic research.
